"Hollow Bracken,"

In commenting upon "Hollow Bracken," in its column of notes about new books, the Globe Democratof St. Louis, says:

"Hanson Penn Diltz is a Kentuckian who has written several tooks that have won for him no small measure of fame and material reward. The latest is "Hollow Bracken." It is a sensational story but there is a large audience for tificial heat at any time, but only most intricate and absorbing nature. There is a good deal of the element of race hatred and blood curse and this affords opportunity for skillful character drawing and sesses more than common interest."

Buff Wyandottes.

I see you are publishing articles from breeders of Plymouth Rocks, Leghorns, Blue Andalusians, etc., on their particular breeds. Now I wonder why you would not as well publish an article on the Buff Wyandottes, if some one would only urge you a little. I believe that you will, and so I will improve this opportunity and write a short article.

Although not a fancy breeder for 20 or 30 years, yet I have been trying to breed and raise poultry according to the rule and law of our fanciers for seven years. I have raised the Brahmas, Leghorns, Plymouth Rocks, and have now selected the Buff Wyandottes, which come very near to my ideal of an all-purpose fowl. Not so roamy and active as the Mediterranean class, and not so clumsy and awkward as the Asiatics.

Many are booming the Plymouth Rocks as the leading American last winter's cold spell. Many were entirely disqualified for breeders, being too badly frosted for fur-

Good mothers, as mine have proven, by hatching out chicks from 17 eggs. during that cold weather in February, and raising them all. This may not conform to the cream from Mr. Wittman's scrap book, nor to the theories that have been advanced that you can't raise chicks early without an incubator; it was an experiment with me, and I believe that I can do the same again with my Buff Wyandottes. I had no arwill venture the assertion that some of the 50 or 100 egg incubators die not bring forth more fruit. Let then the breeders of Buff Wyandottes not stand back, but blow their horns, and all who have had the Klondike fever, let them raise Buffs, and they can see the yellow nuggets at any time. Let us hear from other's in the American Poultry Advocate, and advertise that Southern Kentucky have arranged journal as it deserves .- D. B. STAHLMAN, in American Poultry

Feed For the Sitters.

Most breeders have settled down to shelled corn alone as feed for the sitting heas. As a usual thing this is all that will be required. A mixed ration is more liable to produce bowel troubles and lead to befoulment of the nest. But a hen will occasionally find her way into the hatching room which will lose in health by being confined to an exclusive corn ration, and if she is not given a change will not be able to complete the task assigned to her. When the hens are taken from the nest, if one is seen which does not show a relish for the food and mopes around in the pen while the others are greedily devouring the corn, she should be given access to some other kind of food, or else removed from the pen and her unfinished task given to another hen. Even though she should survive until the hatch is completed, she will be reduced to such a weakened condition that she will be in no shape to take charge of her brood.-Wallace's Farmer.
